INTRODUCTION

As an MBA recruiter for most of the top 50 business schools, I hear military candidates entering bschool say they don't know how to advance in their civilian careers. The opportunity gap between military and civilian employment impacts many types of officers as they face career transition. Outside factors such as starting a family, incurring student debt or taking leave from your day job for any period of time increases both the stakes and mistakes of moving into the civilian workforce. It is important that officers not allow these challenges to become "non-starters" in their careers. Nonstarters turn qualified applicants into underemployed workers who are overqualified for civilian leadership positions. It also prevents officers from leveraging the full career benefits of their military service and experience.

Careers in the 21st century are moving at a rapid pace and are much different now than any time previously. It is possible for you to recover from a slow transition, but gaining momentum from a dynamic start in your civilian career is more important than ever. You want to create positive momentum into leadership positions, advancements and stretch assignments that add purpose and will benefit your career.

Creating opportunities provides you with more favorable career paths and options, greater mobility, location independence and flexibility of schedule. All of which might occur either now or later in your career. Having better experiences also leads to a strong cultural fit with civilian employers, which I believe is important for military officers, and increases the likelihood of both your immediate and future success.

Positive momentum places you on a positive trajectory for your career. It establishes a base to build upon and allows you to make the most of your education and employment opportunities. It gives you time to prove yourself, make a difference and demonstrate value, which drives greater balance and a life outside of work to follow.

The Career Ops Guide proactively addresses many obstacle issues and resolves most potential problem areas before they happen. Doing so turns non-starters into career starts for military leaders and propels officers positively forward into their management careers.

On Employment – Diversity Pays

OPPORTUNITIES FOR EMPLOYERS

Data from sources such as Mckinsey & Company⁽⁸⁾ and Forbes Magazine⁽⁹⁾ show that companies who build diverse teams and organizations achieve a number of results. This includes better financial performance, more profitable operation and higher rates of innovation. Companies realize these benefits by hiring and promoting more military. Data more conclusively shows that companies who hire more military are also more effective at recruiting top leadership talent.
